Signs Your Pet May Have Seasonal Allergies

- Scratching and biting their coat or skin
- Red, inflamed, or infected skin
- Excessive shedding
- Compulsive paw licking in dogs
- Boot scoots or licking their anal glands
- Chronic ear infections or red, waxy ears (common for dogs who are prone to ear problems in the first place)
- Respiratory issues, such as difficulty breathing, coughing, or wheezing (more common in cats)

Signs Your Pet May Have Asthma

1. EXCESSIVE PANTING

If you notice your pet panting heavily and for long periods of time, even with little exercise and in normal conditions, you should contact your veterinarian. Look for wide-mouth breathing as well as heavy chest movement.

2. LOSS OF APPETITE

Complications of asthma can cause the lungs to become hyperinflated, pushing down on the animal's stomach, this may lead to stomach pains causing a lower appetite and as a result lead to poor nutrition. Pay attention to your animal's eating habits if you suspect that they may have the condition.

3. DECREASED ENERGY

Due to a lack of oxygen, your pet may suffer from an overall lack of energy. This can include becoming lethargic and exhibiting intolerance to any significant amount of exercise.

4. RESPIRATORY DISTRESS

Coughing, wheezing, and constantly being out of breath are strong indicators of asthma. These things can come with certain upper respiratory illnesses, but if they are chronic then your animal may have asthma.

5. PALE GUMS

If your pet's gums appear to be pale or blue colored, you should seek help immediately. This is a sign of a severe asthma attack, and it can lead to major complications including death if not properly treated.

Treating Allergies

If you suspect your pet to have allergies scheduling an appointment to discuss your concerns is the first best step. Depending on the cause, treatment can range from diet changes to medications or regular injections. Elimination diets to determine what food allergy a pet may have, a once daily medication like Apoquel to help with itching or a long-lasting injection like Cytropoint for itch relief are just some of the things a doctor may suggest for your pet.
